WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

Northern Region

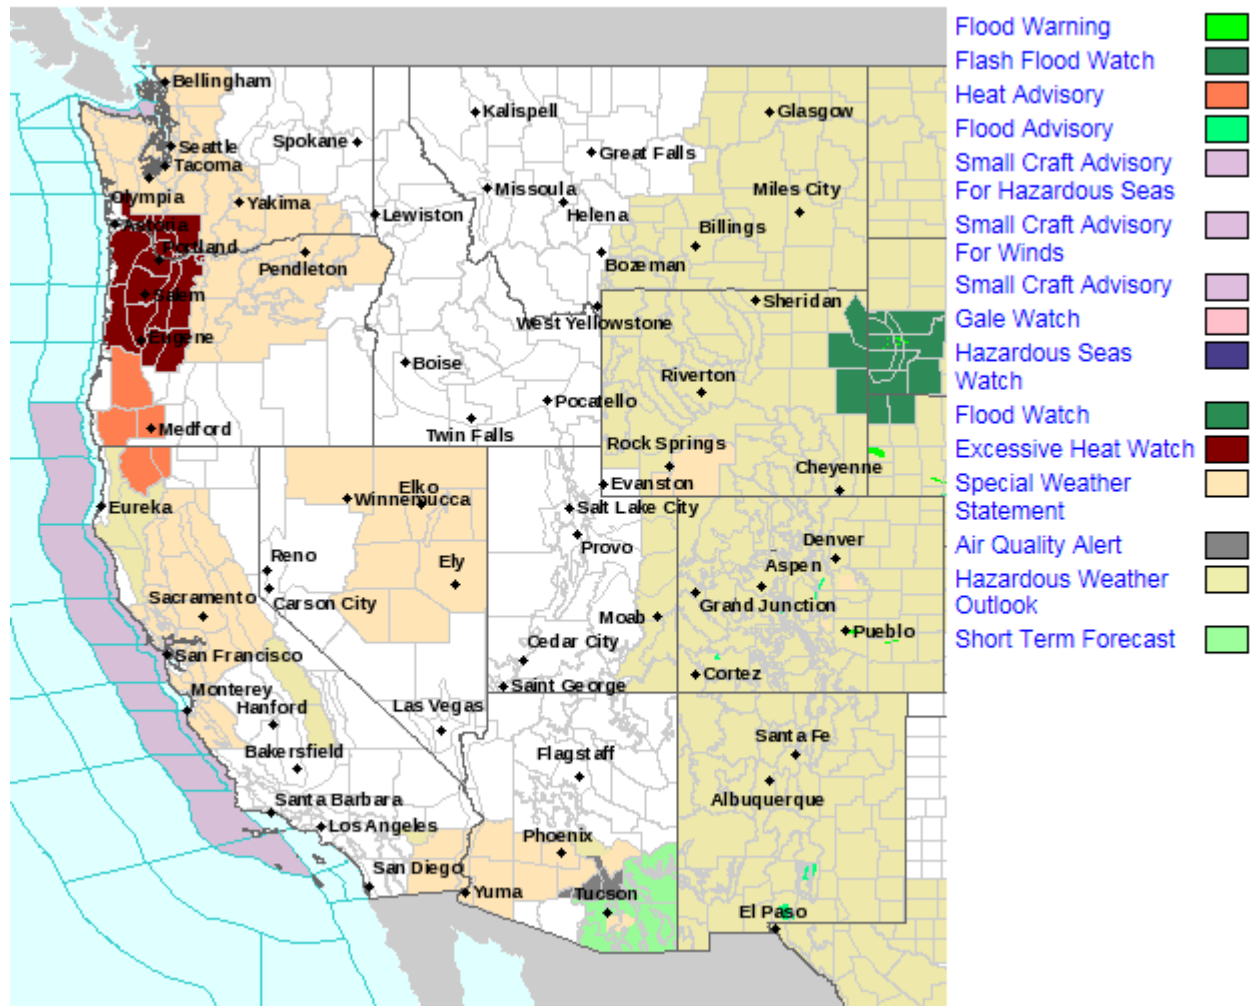

High pressure over the Desert Southwest will be expanding northwest over California during the next few days. This will put a southeast to south wind flow aloft over the state and beginning Friday some moisture will be moving into Northern Operations. Isolated afternoon and evening, mostly dry thunderstorms are expected over the Sierra with even fewer possible over the Cascade and northwest mountains. There is a chance thunderstorm activity will continue overnight in these areas and perhaps expand to all the western mountains north of Clear Lake and into the eastern border of the North Coast Predictive Service Area. Saturday will see a continuation of mostly dry thunderstorms but expanding over all the northern and eastern mountain areas plus the Eastside Predictive Service Area. Fewer storms and a mix of wet and dry ones are expected Sunday, but mostly near and east of the Cascade/Sierra crest. Significant fire potential has been elevated to HIGH RISK in some areas Friday through the weekend due to the anticipated lightning. Daily lightning is expected to continue over all the mountain areas Monday and increase next Tuesday and Wednesday, but by then conditions are expected to be moist enough that most of the lightning will be more wet than dry. Another large increase in temperatures is expected today with the hottest days this week expected to be Thursday and Friday. Many areas will see near to record temperatures through the weekend. The warmer inland valleys will generally be climbing to around a range of 105-112 today into the weekend. Very dry conditions are expected as well, with rather poor overnight relative humidity recovery in many areas for at least the next few nights.

Southern Region

A southerly flow is expected to develop late this week which may lead to elevated convection this weekend. Today and Thursday, look for mostly sunny skies with seasonally warm temperatures. Onshore flow will be slightly stronger today, which will allow temperatures to be 2-4 degrees cooler. Expect highs in the 70s along the coast and in the mountains to the mid-90s in the valleys. West winds of 15-25 mph with occasional higher gusts can be expected in and near the mountains. Friday, mid and high level moisture will quickly increase which will lead to some cumulus buildups near the higher terrain. Isolated showers and one or two thunderstorms will be possible near the Sierra Crest toward evening on Friday. This weekend, more abundant moisture will arrive, leading to scattered convection over the Sierras, the Sierra Foothills and most of the mountains of Southern California. As relative humidity is expected to remain quite low near the surface, some dry lightning strikes will be possible. Saturday, most of the storms are expected to remain over the Angeles National Forest southward into the Cleveland National Forest. Sunday, the moisture will lift northward once again, bringing scattered storms to the Sierras and the Inyo National Forest. An increase in mid and high level clouds may inhibit convection during the morning and early afternoon hours and most of the convection may occur after 3 PM both Saturday and Sunday. Gusty winds, but little rain, will likely result from these storms. Therefore, a high risk day has been issued for most of the Southern California Mountains for Saturday. The high risk expands to include the Sierras on Sunday. Dry antecedent conditions will allow for high ignition components across most fuel beds. Monday and Tuesday, a fresh surge of monsoonal moisture may arrive, causing a transition to wet storms with the possibility of brief heavy rains. Temperatures will remain about the same over the weekend with light winds apart from thunderstorm-generated outflow. The active, wet thunderstorm pattern may last through most of next week.
